Selected List:

Internet Discussion Forums, Listservs and E-mail Announcement Lists for Healthcare Management and Related Disciplines

May 2005

Note: Web and e-mail addresses are subject to change and were current as of publication.

The following discussion forums and e-mail announcement services are of potential interest to hospital and healthcare management disciplines. These e-mail forums are “conversational technologies” that have proliferated on the Internet and become a valuable and integral part of daily business life. They offer a powerful means of timely communication and information seeking for a variety of questions that the published literature cannot provide. Communicating in these forums is somewhat different from the telephone. Useful Netiquette Guidelines from NJHA can be found at:

<http://www.njha.com/memberonly/pub/netiquette.aspx>

E-mail is the basic method of delivery for both types of lists. With discussion forums, sometimes termed listservs, the conversation is two-way. With e-mail announcement lists, the information is directed one-way, from “publisher” to the subscribing group. E-mail lists are simple; you opt to “subscribe” to specific ones and then receive current news headlines, announcements, tables of contents, notices and other newsletter publications sent directly to your e-mail address. They are an effective way to obtain current and timely information on topics of your choosing. All include instructions to “opt-out” of the subscription if needed.

Discussion forums are also very simple: you send e-mail message to a group of people using one e-mail address. The technology distributes your message to everyone in the group, (like a subscription to a newspaper) and likewise, replies to your message are usually distributed to everyone in the group in the same way. This two-way information sharing makes such groups “communities of practice (COPs).” They become a very useful way to garner opinions, find fast facts and obtain unpublished knowledge-- tacit knowledge that is carried around in our heads.

Many discussion forums have searchable message archives, some are private with restrictions on who can join and others are moderated. In the latter, one moderator reads all messages first and selectively distributes messages to the entire group. Groups can be small, with a dozen or more participants, or global, with thousands of subscribers, and the number of messages can be likewise. Some groups even allow you to choose the manner in which you receive messages, such as individual messages via e-mail, via the Web or in a digested form, with one e-mail compiling all messages sent to the group each day. Discussion forums are as varied as the Internet itself. NJHA maintains more than 20 private discussion forums for its members, see: <http://www.njha.com/memberonly/pub/discussion.aspx>

This list is divided into two parts: Discussion Forums & Listservs followed by E-mail Announcement Lists.
