OVERVIEW:

Care-providing facilities, including acute care hospitals, nursing homes and home care agencies, are required as a condition of accreditation by the Joint Commission to have a standing mechanism to address ethical issues that arise in the healthcare settings. Most organizations meet this requirement with an interdisciplinary ethics committee.

The Healthcare Ethics Committee Symposium is designed to address the vital role of healthcare ethics committees and their unique responsibilities, including education, clinical ethics consultation and policy development and review. Using case studies, published materials, institutional policies, role plays and personal experiences, the faculty and attendees will explore issues that typically require ethical analysis and resolution. These issues include informed consent and refusal, decisional capacity and decision making by and for patients, truth telling and confidentiality, care at the beginning and end of life, justice and access to healthcare services, and organizational ethics.

Ethics committees come in all shapes, sizes and stages of development; their members bring varying skill sets, knowledge bases and levels of experience. Because the program's central focus will be skills and strategies to enhance healthcare ethics committees as an organizational resources, this intensive two-day symposium is essential for anyone who chairs, serves on or supports healthcare ethics committees.

OBJECTIVES:

At the end of Day 1 of this symposium, attendees will be able to:

1. Explain the role of healthcare ethics committees and distinguish it from the roles of other organizational resources;
2. Identify ethical issues that commonly arise in the healthcare settings and explain how they are most effectively addressed by ethics committees;
3. Clarify the often competing interest, principles and obligations that create ethical dilemmas in the healthcare settings; and
4. Identify the ethical issues related to decision making truth telling, confidentiality, disclosure, privacy, care at the end of life and decision making for special populations.

At the end of Day 2 of this symposium, attendees will be able to:

1. Identify the competing ethical principles and obligations that create challenging ethical issues;
2. Discusses the moral agency of organizations;
3. Contrast the several models of clinical ethics consultation services;
4. List the types of issues that would be appropriate for clinical ethics and consultation; and
5. Describe a clinical ethics consultation from case presentation to resolution, including analysis and documentation.

TARGET AUDIENCE:

This symposium is designed for healthcare ethics committee chairs and members, including but not limited to physicians, nurses, in-house counsel, social workers, risk managers, clergy, case managers, quality improvement directors, compliance officers, other healthcare professionals and community members.

FACULTY:

Linda Faber Post, JD, MA, BSN, is retired director, Bioethics at Hackensack University Medical Center (HackensackUMC). Prior to her retirement, she was also clinical associate professor in the Department of Medicine at Rutgers New Jersey Medical School and associate professor in the Department of Emergency Medicine at St. George's University School of Medicine.
